Teaching Empathy

If we surround ourselves with people who are just like us, we have a tendency to have less empathy for others who are different. Empathy can be developed, and as parents, we have a responsibility to our children to guide them toward understanding how others feel and being compassionate. The core of empathy is curiosity, so when your child is curious about someone who is different, help him see the value in that person.

Children start to show genuine empathy at a very early age. Not only do they feel another person's pain, but they try to soothe it. Label the feeling and discuss the importance of caring about other people. If you model compassionate behavior and praise your child when he shows empathy, this important emotional connection to others is reinforced. Point out other people's behavior and discuss how it makes him feel.

Teach your child to be aware of both verbal and nonverbal cues to help him understand why others behave the way they do.

Also, teach basic rules of politeness as a way to show respect for others and to understand the benefits of being kind.

Give your child tasks that help him learn responsibility, so he can experience the joy of helping others. Set a positive example by including him in acts of kindness and charity, and explain why you choose to serve others.

Encourage your child to have a diverse circle of friends, and he will learn to value each individual for their own special traits.

Grandparents Day

We would like to invite all grandparents to join us on Friday, September 9, from 7:30 to 9:30 a.m. for Pastries on the Go.

We are grateful for your being our heroes, someone to lean on, and our best friends.

Labor Day

Remember that Endless Discoveries will be closed on Monday, September 5, for Labor Day.

On this day, we pay tribute to the contributions and achievements of American workers. Labor Day weekend also symbolizes the end of summer and the beginning of the school year.

Teacher Spotlight Ms. Dani

Ms. Dani is our Lead Pre-K Teacher, and she is also a mentor for Endless Discoveries teachers. She is the sweetest, most caring teacher. She loves her children and her parents as well.

Ms. Dani gets involved in her children's education here at Endless Discoveries. She welcomes her children with open arms and a smile. She has been with our school for seven years, and we are so blessed to have Ms. Dani. She is very appreciated.
